The Herrington Residence is the second home Paul Bourbeau has designed for the family over the past ten years. Since their first home on Squam Lake, they have grown from four to seven! The family consists of avid sports enthusiasts and as such, they needed a bigger home and a bigger lake from which to enjoy their favorite activity: boating.

The house is reminiscent of the "Adirondack" style cabins that were a ubiquitous part of the lake at the turn of the century. Since then, many of these lake cottages were supplanted by McMansions in the style of traditional suburban homes. The Herrington's were eager to bring the flavor of the past back by using indigenous materials both inside and out. The finished home is nestled between the thriving birches, maples and oak trees that dominate the site. From the lake, the home is barely visible and provides a quiet and private retreat for the family throughout the year.
